SILVER SOLD AT 62.

Still Another Drop in the Price of the White Metal.

No One Can Predict How Much Further It Will Fall.

Mine in Colorado and Smelters Elsewhere Stop Business.

If half the bear stories that are in circulation in Wall street this morning are true, there soon will not be a single silver mine in the world which will be able to mine the white metal at a profit. If prices continue to decline as rapidly as they have during the past two or three days.

This morning the market took another downward plunge, and within half an hour after the Stock Exchange opened the quotation price of silver was 62. Sales of 15,000 ounces were made at that figure.

This represents a drop of 1-2 cents an ounce since the closing price of yesterday.

The market seems here to be thoroughly demoralized, and no one can tell where it will stop. The decline was started by the drop in London quotations, which is the chief silver market of the world.

The early cables reported that bar silver was selling there at 31-32, per ounce, a decline of 1-2-3d. from yesterday's selling price.

The first sale of silver in the New York market was made at 62-1/2 cents from yesterday. Sales of 10,000 ounces were made at that figure. The next sale was 10,000 ounces at 64, followed by 45,000 ounces at 63-1/2, and then came the sale reported above at 62.

Although the transactions were comparatively small, the extreme weakness of the market was shown by the rapid decline which followed each sale. Dealers in bullion seemed to be willing to take almost anything they could get for their silver, and it was evident that holders had been very badly bitten.

A few days ago no one would have believed that silver could go below 60 cents an ounce, and now there is not a single expert to be found who can see the bottom of the pitfall into which the market has apparently tumbled.

A special despatch from Omaha this morning reports that the big smelting and refining works in that city, which have been closed for some time, are now being run at a loss, and will probably close in a few days on account of the decline in silver.

The news received from Denver today is that there will be an immediate and complete suspension of production in that mining district.

A conference of silver-mining owners from Colorado, Montana, Nevada and Utah has been called for this afternoon at Denver, when the situation will be discussed, and in view of the further drop in prices to-day, it is believed the decision will be unanimous in favor of closing the mines.
